So far in this chapter, we've focused on producing output. In Chapter 21, Action Dispatch and Action Controller, we focused on processing input. In a well-designed application, these two aren't unrelated: the output we produce contains forms, links, and buttons that guide the end user to producing the next set of inputs. As you might expect by now, Rails provides a considerable amount of help in this area too.