we just cannot wait for a generation or two for these conventions, etc., to develop. We have to deal with the situation today and tomorrow, this year and the next year. Therefore, the safest way is not to pass legislation in a hurry but to enable Parliament to have authority to deal with such matters. Personally, I confess my own belief is that it is better in any event and always for Parliament to have a large measure of authority, even the authority to make mistakes and go to pieces. Certainly, I realize that in conditions as they exist in India today the exact form, let us say, and of the Constitution of the United Kingdom is not applicable. We are too big a country, too varied a country. We have to have a kind of federation, autonomous States and the like. Therefore, it is inevitable that we should have a written Constitution. We have got it, and it is a fine Constitution. Gradually as we work it, difficulties appear. As wise men we deal with them and change it.

Here may I say, in connection with the use of the coercive apparatus of the State to deal with these problems, it has been our misfortune in the past two or three years to have had to use it in a variety of ways? We have had to use it because, practically speaking, we have had sometimes to face a challenge which can only be comparable to the challenge of war. The challenge may have come internally, but it was a challenge to the State as a war challenge is, that is by violence and by violent effort. We had to face it – as every State has to face it – by the organized strength of the State, whether it is the police or the military strength, whether it was in Telangana[50] or wherever it may be. Yet I should like to remind the House in this connection of Telangana which I mentioned that we have recently seen – and the thing is happening today – another way of meeting this type of situation, a peaceful way, a non-violent way. We have been seeing the frail figure of Vinobha Bhave marching singly into Telangana and by his words and by his action producing a tremendous effect on the people there and possibly even in the immediate present producing much more effect than any armed force could have done and certainly, if that is so in the immediate present, taking a longer view, must certainly be doing more
