Tamilians in distress in Jaffna. And most people who published such journals had their own printing facility, howsoever small. Printers, in general, didn't encourage printing LTTE literature. For that, he needed money. But his family was already in debt and he had no regular income. Arranging their daily meal had become a problem. His mother Padma worked in a middle-level nursing home called Kalyani Medical Centre. His sister Nalini was employed as a secretary in a private firm on a small salary. While Bhagyanathan was looking for money to bring some financial stability to the household, Padma's employers asked her to vacate the quarter provided by the nursing home. Apparently, the quarter was not part of her employment deal. So the family was also looking for a roof over their heads.

Verma made Ravi Shankar sit in front of Bhagyanathan and speak. He claimed that Muthuraja and Baby Subramaniam had come down to Tamil Nadu from Jaffna those days with the responsibility of arranging shelter for the assassins and preparing a base for communication and finance in the city. They learnt about Bhagyanathan's severe financial problem, and they saw in him their 'first recruit' for the assassination plot.[8]

Bhagyanathan sat quiet for a while and then spoke again.

Baby Subramaniam was looking for an opportunity to trap Bhagyanathan emotionally. He casually mentioned to Bhagyanathan that he was contemplating selling off his printing press as he was exploring new business opportunities. He asked Bhagyanathan if he could find him a customer. Bhagyanathan opened his mind and said he didn't have enough money or else he would have bought it himself. The LTTE operative was waiting for that very moment. He asked if Bhagyanathan could pay him in instalments? Bhagyanathan agreed, and Subramaniam sold him the press for a mere Rs 5,000 payable in parts. The deal gave Subramaniam access to Bhagyanathan's family, which was desperately looking for shelter, and the printing press came along with a house. He met Nalini at the printing press and asked her to assist her brother, who was doing great work for the Tamils living in distress in Sri Lanka. The printing press soon turned into a hideout for LTTE members; meetings were also held there.
