worked out an original design for a vest bomb. In his design, six grenades could be fitted into it—the grenades would be made of less than 100 grams of RDX wrapped around 2,800 splinters adjusted within a casing of TNT. The six grenades would be wired in parallel and the circuit could be activated with two toggle switches, one for arming the system and the other for triggering the explosion. Peraribalan's ingenuity ensured that the device could be charged with a one-piece battery of 9 volts.[4]

Back in Murugan's cell, he added that empty grenade shells were procured from an LTTE operative in Coimbatore and given to Peraribalan. Some LTTE operatives had been given the task of manufacturing grenade shells in Coimbatore. They had sent over ten thousand shells to Jaffna. While two operatives, Raghu and Guna, looked after the manufacturing, another named Vicky managed the transportation in Maruti vans to Vedaranyam port. From there, another operative named Mahalingam shipped the shells to Jaffna.[5]

Names cropped up in dozens in each interrogation session. Digging up more information on them, tracking and arresting them was proving to be a gargantuan task for the SIT. They could not ignore any clue. But the ground reality was different. Many clues, leads or information could not be verified or followed up on. Part of the follow-up was shared with the local police, which did not yield much result.

The interrogation of Peraribalan, Bhagyanathan and Murugan continued with Raju, Kanth, Verma and Ragothaman; Kaarthikeyan would occasionally join in. Bhagyanathan had met Peraribalan, along with Haribabu, at Subha Sundaram's photo agency office in May 1990. Peraribalan's father was a staunch supporter of the DMK's ally party Dravida Kazhagam (DK), an organization that openly endorsed the LTTE's fight for Eelam and extended its support base for carrying out propaganda among the youth of Tamil Nadu. Subramaniam had taken Peraribalan to Jaffna through a secret route. Peraribalan's induction into the LTTE's violent battle took place at that time.[6]

He returned to India five months later and carried a sizeable quantity of the LTTE's propaganda material, including literature on how to train the
