LTTE cadres in arms in Jaffna. An album of photographs seized from Peraribalan's house in Madras had many pictures that showed him with Prabhakaran, Pottu Amman, military chief Mahathiya and other LTTE guerillas. Any Tamil youth who took interest in Eelam would be impressed with the political growth of Peraribalan and Haribabu.

In December 1990, Muthuraja had introduced Bhagyanathan and Arivu to an important LTTE operative in Madras—Nixon. He was an assistant to intelligence chief Pottu Amman. Nixon had given Peraribalan and Bhagyanathan the responsibility of providing logistical, political and medical support to LTTE operatives who were already functioning from different parts of the state. In February 1991, Nixon brought Murugan to them and asked them to arrange for his shelter. This happened a fortnight after the DMK government in Tamil Nadu was dismissed by the Centre in January 1991 over the state government's alleged links with the LTTE following the arrest of various cadres. Both Bhagyanathan and Peraribalan knew Prabhakaran would not take Rajiv Gandhi's role behind the dismissal of the DMK government in Tamil Nadu lying down. Prabhakaran had declared war against the Congress supremo.[7]

Peraribalan confessed that he had presented his design of the bomb to Sivarasan and got his approval. Satisfied, Sivarasan told him to look for a tailor who would stitch the vest that would hide the bomb. Nalini found a local tailor. Sivarasan pointed out that the fabric used should be heavy enough to support a bomb close to a kilo in weight. So the vest was made of denim. After the vest jacket was ready, Peraribalan fit the bomb into it. Both he and Murugan felt the bomb was ready for use. They made another presentation to Sivarasan. He approved of everything. Murugan admitted that Sivarasan was not happy about his relationship with Nalini, but seeing the progress in work, he realized that work was worship for Murugan and that he would not allow his personal matters to come in the way.[8]