‘Wait till the evening. They must be busy.’

‘I see.’ Anirudhya was a little nervous.

‘Relax, brother. I shall try and find out.’

Anirudhya went back to his desk and could not sit any longer. He went to the cartoonist Ninan, who was in the middle of sharing a joke with his colleague Subodh. They sat in the same cabin. Ninan didn’t miss the look of uncertainty on Anirudhya’s face. He waved at him to have a seat and asked if he would like some coffee. What was intriguing was that Ninan didn’t ask about his Madras trip at all. Something was wrong. Anirudhya shared his feelings with Ninan. The famous cartoonist and a key member of the magazine laughed out loud. Before Anirudhya could figure out what had made Ninan laugh like that, the receptionist peeped into the cabin and told Anirudhya to see Bobb in his cabin. Ninan winked at Anirudhya.

Anirudhya stood in front of Bobb and counted his moments. Bobb was printing out a copy, so, naturally, he paid no attention to him. The wait seemed never-ending to Anirudhya. Once it was done, Bobb clumsily wrapped up the metre-long printout and gave it to Anirudhya. ‘You read it first. See if it’s all right.’

Anirudhya didn’t even ask what it was. He went straight to his desk and had a look at the first paragraph of the copy. It was his Madras datelined story on Rajiv Gandhi’s assassination. He started reading it and felt that Bobb had done sheer magic to the story he had filed.
