ascertain the LTTE's financial reach. Two senior officers of the SIT were coordinating with other agencies to get a handle on the enormous scale of the LTTE's international dealings.[10] But every time it came to the top brass of the SIT, the mandate was to work on the LTTE and secure the conviction of the arrested assassins in the court of law. It was not only the SIT—strangely, the R&AW also did precious little to be on KP's trail. If one dug into the archives of the same R&AW, one would find a dossier on the jetsetter LTTE operative. Serious allegations were levelled against him, indicating his links with international arms dealers, including an infamous operator from Saudi Arabia. The allegations gained significance as the Saudi Arabian arms dealer was known to be close to New Delhi. But a thorough probe to establish his links with Sivarasan was overlooked for reasons best known to the powers that be.

When Anirudhya tried to check with his sources in the R&AW for KP's links with the Saudi arms dealer, he was redirected to the SIT, since the R&AW was 'not investigating the assassination case'. Exactly in the same fashion, when Anirudhya asked Kaarthikeyan about the same, he said, 'Please ask agencies that are responsible for intelligence gathering from foreign sources.' He was referring to the R&AW without taking its name. However, what one could not take away from Kaarthikeyan was the way he remained focused and forged ahead with the investigation to secure the conviction of the assassins.

Anirudhya ran into a mine of information on Sivarasan. Details around Sivarasan were pouring in from multiple security agencies as the SIT focused on the trail of the mastermind of the assassination. He had planned the assassination and directly supervised its execution on the ground. A member of the LTTE's intelligence wing, he used many aliases, including Sivarajan, Rajan, Rajah, Raghuvaran, Raghu, Raghuappah, Arumai and Aravinth. His peer group called him 'Ottraikkanna', which meant a one-
