EPRLF had an office in Kodambakkam in Madras, where he was stationed. He certainly didn't disappoint Sivarasan and led to fruition the LTTE's first operation on Indian soil—the assassination of Padmanabha and eleven of his followers. The entire operation was devised by Sivarasan, along with a deputy, Santhan. Both Prabhakaran and Pottu Amman were impressed by his work. Seeing promise in him, Prabhakaran thought Raghuvaran was destined for bigger assignments in India.

Even as the legend of One-Eyed Jack grew in the Indian media, the progress of the investigation was failing to match up to the expectation of Prime Minister Chandra Shekhar. He called Vijay Karan and Kaarthikeyan to Delhi and made that clear. He was surprised at the fact that the mastermind behind the assassination was nowhere to be seen. He asked both of them if any support was lacking from New Delhi. Kaarthikeyan thanked the PM for his support and tried to explain the manhunt his team had launched to catch the mastermind. But like the legendary Scarlet Pimpernel, in Baroness Orczy's novel of the same name, the one-eyed fugitive seemed to be everywhere at once. One day he was seen in Madurai, the next he was supposed to be in Visakhapatnam and the next he was 'spotted' near Bangalore. Sivarasan had become an enigma.

In a meeting with Prime Minister P.V. Narasimha Rao (who became Prime Minister on 21 June 1991), the CBI boss Vijay Karan tried to explain that the investigation into Rajiv Gandhi's assassination had fanned out into remote corners of the country while following several leads. A major outcome of the CBI investigation, Karan reportedly told the Prime Minister, was that it had exposed the network the LTTE had successfully established in Tamil Nadu. Many of the organization's hideouts were hit and cadres put behind bars. He told him he was sure that the mastermind of the assassination was holed up in India.[13] Reportedly, the Prime Minister was not satisfied with Karan's submission. He reminded the CBI boss of the
