SIT's attention that Pottu Amman had warned Sivarasan of Indian security agencies using gas to catch him alive. The gas would make him numb and prevent him from reaching for the cyanide pill. Pottu Amman had underlined his instructions that, come what may, Sivarasan should never be caught alive. Swearing on Prabhakaran, Sivarasan had assured his boss that he was aware of the SIT tailing him like a 'dog' but that he would never allow a stigma to be attached to the LTTE on his account. Sri Kumar concluded the meeting saying, 'It's already late at night. Any movement outside the house will catch the inmates' attention. The element of surprise will be compromised. Let's strike tomorrow morning.' The meeting was over.

On the morning of 2 August, the tracking team led by Sri Kumar reached the location. The plan was for two innocuous officers in disguise to knock on the door of the house, pretending to be lost in the area, even as the Black Cats would take their positions. The two officers rang the bell. A side window opened for a moment and was almost immediately shut. Sri Kumar understood that the inmates were alert—maybe they had been alert since yesterday and hence the lights were kept switched off until night. He signalled to Ravindran to move. The commandos broke open the front and back entry points of the house. The scene inside was frightening. One boy was biting a cyanide capsule while another was rushing into a bathroom. A commando broke into the bathroom and gave cyanide antidote shots to the boys hiding inside. They were handed over to the local police. The boys were rushed to the hospital. However, neither could be saved for want of time.[7]

The commissioner of Bangalore Police was shocked to learn about how the LTTE was operating in his city. It was undoubtedly an intelligence failure on the part of his force as well as of the central agencies responsible for collecting domestic intelligence. One more time, One-Eyed Jack had shown a clean pair of heels to the SIT. There was a mixed feeling among the members of the tracking team. If, on the one hand, there was the increasing worry about how to stop the fugitives from biting the cyanide pills, on the other, the trackers had seen a silver lining too—Sivarasan and
