and he was soon inducted into the political group. He had met Sivarasan during the war. Soon, he was shifted to India with the responsibility of transporting LTTE guerrillas from one hideout to another. He ran an unlicensed travel agency in India for that.[2]

Two injured boys were already present in Rangan's house. Irumborai was the new entrant. And then came Trichy Santhan at the end of June. He asked Irumborai to relocate Jamuna from Neyveli. And then he talked about Sivarasan, who had to be either shifted out of India in a boat or brought into that city by road. The Indian navy and the Indian Coast Guard were patrolling the sea route to Jaffna, so taking Sivarasan in a boat would be very risky. The other option he had in mind was trying the Naxalites from Andhra Pradesh. But Irumborai could not find a via media to approach the Naxalites.

Two days later, Trichy Santhan returned to Bangalore. He could not trust telephone communication, which was under the vigil of the Indian police. So he came physically to give the news of transporting Sivarasan, Shubha and Nero to the Indira Nagar house in the next two days. Therefore, Irumborai should be ready to receive them and take care of their needs, and whatever else Sivarasan asked for. On 28 June, Sivarasan came with Shubha, Nero, Rangan, Dhanasekaran and Vicky.

As Vicky narrated this, Ragothaman jumped hearing Vicky take his own name—he, in his deposition after his arrest in Coimbatore, had categorically denied having anything to do with Sivarasan in person. Ragothaman, instead of giving Vicky a piece of his mind for withholding crucial information, asked, 'How did you manage to pass through so many checkpoints and reach Bangalore without getting caught?'[3]

'We took Sivarasan in an oil tanker,' said Vicky, with a slightly smug smile on his face.

'Oil tanker? Whose oil tanker?'

'Dhanasekaran's oil tanker.'

'Who is Dhanasekaran?'

'He is in the transport business—DK Transporters. He owns lorries, buses.'
