Viswanathan had thought a visit to the party office could get Anirudhya something.

As luck would have it, Anirudhya ran into an old intelligence contact from Delhi who was then stationed in Madras for the past year, monitoring the affairs of the DMK. He was not a very senior officer in the country's domestic intelligence-gathering agency. He was a 'field man'. And such officials, or 'moles', always proved to be effective as they went by facts and not mere conjecture or analysis.

Anirudhya caught up with him early next morning at the Marina beach. He was done with his morning jog. The beach was not crowded. They spoke over some fresh idli followed by filter coffee. Anirudhya's first query was if there was any mystery behind Rajiv Gandhi's coming to Tamil Nadu to address just one rally. His 'field man' tried to give him some perspective. One was not sure of a mystery behind the leader's trip to the state but destiny calling him there could not be ruled out. Intelligence officials are not known for using words such as 'destiny' and 'fate'. Anirudhya was even more curious as the 'field man' went into the events that had led Rajiv to visit Sriperumbudur.[1]

Congress General Secretary Margaret Alva had finalized Rajiv's tour programme on 13 May for Orissa (now Odisha) and Tamil Nadu, where Maragatham Chandrasekar's constituency, Sriperumbudur, had not been included. When going through the draft itinerary of his tour, Rajiv, in his own handwriting, had included 'Aunty's' constituency and only a day for Tamil Nadu. Was he writing his fate? But there was much more to it than that.

Rajiv's tour programme was published across all newspapers on 17 May. Something very interesting happened. TNCC President Vazhappady Ramamurthy sent a fax to Rajiv asking if his tour of Tamil Nadu was necessary, considering that the Congress party was in alliance with the AIADMK, whose leader, Jayalalithaa, had a very strong hold on the state. The state Congress chief was not endorsing Rajiv's visit to the state, let alone to Sriperumbudur. Rajiv had simply noted 'So what' on the fax sent by Ramamurthy. Was it destiny pulling him to Sriperumbudur?
