just ₹24,000 a week is too little, and the cooperative bank is not even able to give me that much cash each week,' said Tamaliya.[22]

- John Kokkat, proprietor of the Popular Dairy Farm in Bhiwandi district, Maharashtra has 156 animals (10 cows and 146 buffaloes), which provide 900 litres of milk per day collectively. He worries they may not survive the demonetization. With no fodder to feed them, they may soon just be dead meat. Kokkat faces a double-edged sword. First, he is worried that he doesn't have enough legal tender to pay for the special feed for his cattle. 'I have enough money to pay for the coconut oil-cakes, but it is in the old ₹500 and ₹1,000 notes. I also have over ₹7 lakh stuck in the market. I need to pay my creditors and labourers, but as I could not deposit cash, two of my cheques to the feed supplier have already bounced and I had to plead for a few bags of feed. No supplier can accept these defunct notes,' he said.
- The situation at Padgha weighing bridge was equally grim, laden with overflowing hay from the trucks. Kalpesh Nichite, a trader from Sahapur, said, 'We collect the hay from farmers at ₹8 to ₹15 per bundle and with the help of six daily workers. Now, the weighing bridge has stated they won't be taking the old currency so the traders and dairy owners are forced to keep bills pending. It is a chain reaction and we all are suffering.'[23]

Tea Gardens and Workers

There are three main tea producing areas in India. The Terai, Dooars and Darjeeling region (with approximately 363 gardens employing 4.25 lakh people); Assam; and south India (where tea is grown on 1.19 lakh hectares across Tamil Nadu, Kerala and Karnataka).

The management of several gardens suspended operations post-demonetization as they had no cash to pay workers. The stories below are illustrative of the distress faced by tea plantation workers across the country.
