- Ambika Kumbhar's small kirana store off the Maharashtra state highway 35 has seen a drastic reduction in the number of cars that stop by after the note ban. 'I earn only ₹200 to ₹300 a week, and cannot even afford to pay my electricity bill any more.'
- Mangalwara's Patang Bazaar in Bhopal has been a gloomy place post-demonetization. Nawaab, a kite seller whose family has been in this business for more than 50 years, said, 'There were three permanent shops in Patang Bazaar in addition to many hawkers who sold kites on the roadside. But November 8 put most hawkers out of business and led to closure of two shops… Earlier, sale of kites would start from November, but this year, we are still waiting for orders and customers for Sankranti. Last year, we sold over 50,000 kites during the festival, but this year we just hope to touch 50 per cent of last year's sale.'[29]
- Faizal Ahmed, a shopkeeper at the Ashok Nagar market in Delhi running a stall selling women's garments for the last 25 years, said, 'We sell cheap products and our customers are mainly from the lower strata of the society. Our customers don't have credit or debit cards. Many of them don't have smartphones and, those who have, don't know how to make digital transactions. Our profit margin is between ₹50–60. If we start using cards we will have to increase the cost of our products to meet the surcharge rate, which is not feasible. The USP of our business is cheap prices and we cannot increase them beyond a point.'[30]

The Textile Industry: Cotton Farmers, Weavers, Mills, Looms and Textile Merchants

The textile and apparel sector is the second largest employer after agriculture and contributes two per cent to India's GDP. Most workers in this industry are migrant workers who are paid in cash and who do not have any bank accounts. The entire supply chain from the cotton farmer, to ginning factories, to weavers and power looms and
