rest, ₹4–5 lakh crore, are being used in northeast and Jammu and Kashmir to fuel trouble in India. That will be neutralized.'

Prime Minister Modi's fourth main goal: Digital/cashless/less-cash society

Moving to a Digital and Cashless India: Although the goal of a digital or cashless economy was not mentioned at all in the Prime Minister's original speech on 8 November, full front-page newspaper advertisements by an e-wallet start-up displaying the Prime Minister's image on the morning of 9 November heralded the dawn of a new era!

The Prime Minister spelt out his vision of a cashless India, in his Mann Ki Baat radio show on 27 November 2017: 'Scrapping these notes has opened other avenues to make payments. Download apps of banks and e-payment options. Shopkeepers can keep card swiping facilities and everyone can ensure they pay safely using their credit and debit cards. If not a 100 per cent cashless society, I request you to make India a "less-cash" society.'

Finance Minister Jaitley's two main goals: 'Widen and deepen' the tax base and create a 'larger and cleaner' GDP Though initially silent on demonetization, the Finance Minister Arun Jaitley added his own objectives a few months later.

To expand the tax base Responding to a Parliamentary panel on 11 January 2017, he said, 'Targeted verification of suspect substantial deposits is likely to widen and deepen the tax base.'

To integrate the informal economy into the formal sector and create a 'larger and cleaner' GDP In his Budget speech on 1 February 2017, the Finance Minister said, 'We are moving from informal to formal economy and the government is now seen as a trusted custodian of public money.' On 13 February 2017, he added, 'Demonetization was a bold and decisive strike in a series of measures to arrive at a bigger,
