liveable for the citizens of Mumbai: a promenade on the eastern waterfront, a mangrove eco-park and flamingo- watching centre at Sewri, passenger water transport terminals along the eastern freeboard, the redevelopment of Sassoon docks, a marina, and a maritime museum among others.

I believe we need this kind of constructive politics in India. Those who win an election on the basis of a manifesto should fulfil their promises to the electorate. Those who lose an election must fearlessly stand up against what they believe to be wrong, but also be constructive and help the authorities do what is right.

This brings us to the demonetization of 2016. When the note ban was announced, I was one of the first, from the banking and financial sector, to criticize the move on the national media.

Though I am a member of AAP and disagree with the ideology and many of the policies of the BJP-led NDA government, I believe it is important for the government to succeed, if India is to succeed. Each of us have a vested interest in the success of our government, particularly with respect to our economy.

There are certain good policies of the Modi government that have been well implemented, such as RERA[2] (Real Estate [Regulation and Development] Act), which protects home-buyers from unscrupulous property developers, and the IBC[3] (Insolvency and Bankruptcy Code), which creates a single law for insolvency and bankruptcy, protecting the interests of creditors and small investors, and providing entrepreneurs a swift exit when businesses fail.

There are other good policies which have been poorly implemented, such as GST,[4] the Goods and Services Tax. Dubbed by the government as a 'Good and Simple' tax, it has, unfortunately, turned out to be anything but that. The rollout appears to have been done without adequate homework. Repeated policy rollbacks and amendments, and a GST Network (GSTN) filled with glitches, have resulted in headaches for both tax payers and authorities. Notwithstanding its poor implementation, this is a positive economic