community?

8. How do we ensure justice is fair and speedy and that the rule of law is applicable to all irrespective of political, money and social power?
9. How will we finance and build the physical (e.g., roads, electricity generation, etc.) and social (e.g., education and health) infrastructure, which will enable and empower our citizens to maximize their potential?
10. How will we deal with geo-political challenges that confront us and deal with the growing threat of terrorism?

In short, what do we need to do to ensure 'Achhe Din' for our children?

These are the challenges that have confronted every government in India, since Independence, and indeed it can be argued, depending on which side of the political spectrum one is, that progress has been made on many fronts. However, it is equally true that much remains to be done.

As an optimist on the future of India, I believe the next few decades could be the golden years for India. Our people have the entrepreneurial skills and innovativeness to help our economy prosper. We have a consumer market of such size and depth that there is room for a billion entrepreneurs, ranging from the tiny solo-preneur to the global-scale titans of Indian industry, to coexist and flourish. Given our high propensity to save, domestic savings can both help propel this growth and finance our infrastructural deficits. The list of India's competitive advantages is a long one, and, I believe, more than adequate to overcome all the challenges we face.

What we need, however, is honest and competent leadership. Leaders who genuinely pursue the maxim of 'Maximum Governance, Minimum government'.[2] Who provide a safe and secure environment for citizens to lead their lives and where the rule of law and justice prevail. Who invest in the infrastructure needed to skill Indians and
