develop India. And who create a level playing field for every Indian to maximize her potential, without having to battle the obstacles of corruption and cronyism that stifle creativity, innovation and enterprise.

The tragedy of our present-day politics is that in their quest to win elections, many of our politicians and political parties have lost sight of the fact that winning or losing is not the objective – creating a better future for Indians is.

Their slogans have captivated our imagination for 70 years. Sadly, we wait in vain for them to deliver, and, in the meanwhile, suffer the consequences of ill thought-out policies that are badly implemented, ranging from nasbandi to notebandi.

One can only hope that as we journey into the future, our political leaders pay heed to the wise words of Milton Friedman who said, 'The government solution to a problem is usually as bad as the problem and very often makes the problem worse.'

Had those who made the decision and 'planned' for India's 2016 demonetization reflected on this sage advice, they would not have gone ahead.
