17. NSEL, provided an electronic platform for spot trading in farm products and bullion. It was embroiled in a major scam that came to light after the government, in July 2013, restrained the exchange from trading, as commodities that were traded were not found in the warehouses. The exchange defaulted payments to about 13,000 investors and had to be eventually shut down. The Enforcement Directorate (ED) had registered a criminal case under the Prevention of Money Laundering Act (PMLA) in 2013, along with the Economic Offences Wing (EOW) of Mumbai, police to probe the case. The ED filed a 20,000-page charge sheet against NSEL and 67 others in a Mumbai court, explaining NSEL funds were laundered and 'illegally ploughed into purchase of private properties'. The charge sheet detailed a money trail amounting to ₹3,721.22 crore. 'The NSEL Scam and History', https://capitalmind.in/the-nsel-scam-and-history/

20. This section allows a public authority to withhold information, the disclosure of which 'would endanger the life or physical safety of any person.' The section also allows exemption for disclosing information which would 'identify the source of information or assistance given in confidence for law enforcement or security purposes.' However, Under Section 4 of the Right to Information (RTI) Act, it is mandatory for a public authority to 'publish all relevant facts while formulating important policies or announcing the decisions which affect public and to provide reasons for its administrative or quasi-judicial decisions to affected persons.' Therefore, in principle, the RBI should have released information on demonetization and its implementation on a suo motu basis. Not only was no information on this matter placed in the public domain under Section 4, by the RBI, RTI activists found to their dismay that both the RBI and the Prime Minister's Office (PMO) refused to share information under cover of Section 8 of the RTI Act.
