conversion of ₹1.99 crore of demonetized currency into new notes. The CBI statement said that the accused, along with other unknown officials entrusted with the responsibility of new currency notes 'fraudulently' gave away new notes to the tune of ₹1.99 crore to RBI officials and others.

- The CBI had earlier arrested another employee of RBI Mysore in a separate case in which currency worth over ₹6 lakh was converted by him, using his influence over officials of the State Bank of Mysore.
- A senior RBI official from the RBI printing press in Mysore was arrested in connection with the seizure of ₹5.70 crore in new currency notes.
- On 23 December, the CBI conducted raids at 11 premises of Vaidyanath Urban Cooperative Bank in Maharashtra, and recovered ₹10 crore demonetized notes. Investigations were also commenced against the Mumbai District Central Co-operative Bank as a large sum in old currency notes was deposited in the bank post-demonetization.
- On 28 December, the Enforcement Directorate arrested the manager of Kotak Mahindra Bank's Connaught Place branch for converting ₹35 crore demonetized currency into new notes, and having alleged links with hawala traders.

One of the saddest consequences of demonetization was that banking, once a highly respected profession, and bankers, who were looked upon as trustworthy and credible partners, came to be looked upon with suspicion, and bankers as a bunch of people in cahoots with the corrupt.

Autonomy of the RBI

Another regrettable consequence of the note ban was that, as a consequence of their actions, the RBI began to be perceived as a
