The government demonetized the 25, 35 and 75 kyat notes and instead issued notes of kyat 45 and 90.

Ananth Karthikeyan, writing in Mint, described the process: 'Not even a semblance of an official reason was given this time. 60–80 per cent of notes became worthless overnight, but no exchange or compensation was provided. The Junta soon allowed reimbursement for up to K100, only so that restive students (who were now penniless) would have enough money to leave the cities and return home, instead of rioting in the cities.'

The economic chaos that resulted as a consequence of the disastrous demonetizations and economic mismanagement by the Junta led to widespread riots (referred to as the 8888 Uprising), and eventually a military coup by General Saw Maung.

In 1989, the country's name was changed from Burma to Myanmar, and new Myanmar kyat notes were issued. This time, however, the old Burmese kyats were not demonetized, but were left to simply fade away through wear and tear.

Soviet Union and Russia:[17] Demonetizations of 1991, 1993 and 1998

1991 On 22 January 1991, the President of the USSR, Mikhail Gorbachev, signed a decree demonetizing all 50 rouble and 100 rouble banknotes (issued since 1961), and restricted monthly bank deposit withdrawals of new notes to 500 roubles, from the state-owned Sberbank (Savings Bank). The Vremya (Time) television news programme broadcast this news at 9.00 p.m.

The purpose of the demonetization, named the Pavlov Reform after its architect, the Minister of Finance, Valentin Pavlov, was officially to '…remove counterfeit roubles allegedly being brought into the Soviet Union from abroad.' The government proclaimed that this measure would freeze the assets of speculators, corrupt officials, illegal businesses, and end counterfeit money.
