Yeltsin increased the exchange threshold to 1,00,000 roubles (about US$100).

The Prime Minister, Viktor S. Chernomyrdin, said that roubles dumped into Russia from the former Soviet republics were outnumbering those printed by the central bank, making control over the money supply more difficult. He said there was a sufficient supply of the new banknotes, which featured the white, blue, and red Russian flag. The central bank said the move '…would eliminate outdated and counterfeit notes, many of them issued during the Soviet era and still bearing the likeness of Lenin' and that their estimate was that 20 per cent of Russia's money supply consisted of older notes held in former, neighbouring Soviet republics.

Pavel S. Bunich, a well-known economist, summed up the 1993 Russian demonetization by stating that the short-term economic impact would not be as significant as the demonetization of 1991, because the hyperinflation that followed 1991 had already destroyed the savings of many Russians. However, it would cause people '…to judge that once again their government has deceived them', given that the move was once again confiscatory in nature.

By September 1993, the economic situation exacerbated the political opposition to the Yeltsin government. The parliament tried to depose Yeltsin, who responded by dissolving the parliament and calling for new elections. Street battles erupted in Moscow between supporters and opponents of Yeltsin. This constitutional crisis climaxed on 4 October with the military shelling the parliament under Yeltsin's orders.

The 1993 demonetization did not strengthen the rouble but led instead to serious economic complications both within Russia and its neighbours, the former Soviet states, whose currencies were linked to the rouble. Russia tried to negotiate the establishment of a new type of rouble zone, but did not succeed.

The 1993 demonetization nevertheless achieved an important goal – it gave Russia a single set of valid banknotes, instead of a variety of
