Scotland . . . rejoiced in victory over the English." Robert Bruce was no longer a rebel: "After the victory," says the Chronicle of Lanercost, "Robert Bruce was commonly called King of Scotland by all men." Immediately he launched a war of conquest, sending ships to Ireland and marching over the border into northern England to raid, burn, and plunder.[14]

Meanwhile, Edward was forced to return to London in humiliation. "If he had followed the advice of the barons," remarks the Vita, "he would have humbled the Scots with ease." This fact had not escaped the barons; and a full revolt was delayed only because England was now facing a new crisis.

*See map 59.1, p. 415.