One brother slew another
And sons moved against father
No one asked after law or right
For some they held to the king
And some the queen would follow.[4]

The war was violent but brief. In February of 1389, on a plain east of Falköping, Margaret's army defeated Albert's men in straight battle. Albert himself was taken prisoner. Unfamiliar with his surroundings, he had ridden out onto a frozen marsh and fallen through. Margaret, who had not appreciated her new nickname, ordered him crowned with a fool's cap and taken back to the Danish castle of Lindholm; there he would remain imprisoned for the next six years.

86.1 The Scandinavian Kingdoms

Most of the country was now Margaret's, but the city of Stockholm, loyal to Albert, held out until 1395. When it finally surrendered, Margaret could