Evolutionary change for society, revolutionary change for government

The pursuit of life, liberty and happiness without interference

We must create an environment in which the public has stability. Stability means many things. Stability means the confidence of planning a life, of starting a family, knowing that there will be no upheaval in society for a lifetime, which means a horizon of eighty years for a twenty-year-old adult. Stability means the certainty that one will not face violence for the next eighty years. Stability means the ability to create savings without fearing expropriation by the state or a private person. Stability means being able to embark on a business plan knowing that no disruption in the political or economic environment will arise.

These are primordial values in their own right. We must value such stability and endeavour to achieve it. This requires a respect for each individual in society. In public policy, we should not undertake actions that will disrupt the lives of the people on a large scale.

It is all too easy, in the world of public policy, to slip into the mode of directing people on how to lead their lives. But the pursuit of happiness by each person is best achieved when the state creates conditions of stability and vanishes into the background.

The ideal non violent state will be an ordered anarchy.
