knowledge, called Viveka-jñāna, is intuitive and consists in a clear discrimination of the Puruṣa from the Prakṛiti.

Yoga here means the discipline required for the restoration of the original and free status of the individual Self, and Viyoga, or separation of the Jīva from the true Self, is regarded as the prime cause of suffering.

To the Sānkhya aim of discrimination (Viveka) between Puruṣa and Prakṛiti, the Yoga adds an eight-fold psycho-physical discipline for the reattainment of the Puruṣa's originally pure nature (experienced in the state of Asamprajnāta Samādhi). This means complete transcendence of life's suffering whether psychological (Ādhyātmika), environmental (Ādhibhautika), or supernatural (Ādhidaivika).

God is rejected on grounds of logic and life's sufferings, though Yoga admits Him as an aid to spiritual realization. In short, Sānkhya-Yoga is an exalted idealism without theistic implications wherein the wonderful harmony of the Puruṣa and the Prakṛiti are supposed to discharge the functions of God.

The Mīmāmsā

Mīmāmsā, literally meaning systematic investigation, stresses reflection, or Vicāra. The Pūrva and the Uttar Mīmāmsā are based upon the Brāhmaṇas and the Upaniṣads respectively. The earliest literature of the Pūrva Mīmāmsā is known as Jaimini's Sūtra (about 300-200 B.C.) and has been interpreted differently by Kumārila Bhatt and Prabhākar Misra. Mīmāmsā believes in plurality of souls and material ultimates and is both pluralistic and realistic.

The Mīmāmsā envisages a vague kind of modified pluralism inasmuch as Reality is described as "identity in difference." Five categories, substance, quality, action, universals, and non-existence, are admitted. The Self is regarded as all-pervading and eternal. Two kinds of universals, abstract and concrete, are recognized. Otherwise, the categories are generally conceived in the Nyāya-Vaiśeṣika fashion.

Mīmāmsā has some notable contributions to make in the field of epistemology. The Self is supposed to be known in all knowledge although only as an object. For instance, in "I see a table" both the "I-notion" and the "table-notion" are apprehended. Knowledge is a changing activity of the Self, which, in knowing, manifests itself as well as the object. Objects are known directly and the Self, indirectly. According to Mīmāmsā epistemology, all knowledge is intrinsically valid; all error is either due to outside interference in
