The following figure shows the high-level architecture of Docker on Linux:

However, Docker is built on Linux containerization technologies that Mac and Windows do not have natively. Docker gets around this by installing a lightweight Linux virtual machine that runs the Docker daemon. This leads to a slightly different architecture for Docker for Mac/Windows, as shown in the following figure.

So how does this help us explain why we need to use -i and -t options?