Hundreds of excavations at Harappa sites such as Rupar and Kalibangan did not reveal many examples of specialized artifacts that are normally an integral part of ancient culture: weaponry. There have been copper spears unearthed at these places, as well as collections of clay balls assumed to have been used in defense of the city, but these are few and artworks portraying any sort of warfare are very few and far between. Though it would be naïve to assume the early Indians of the Indus Valley were totally without violence and conflict, theirs does seem to have been a culture of peace. The farmers and city-builders of the Indus Valley civilization thrived from about 7000 to 3300 BCE.
