Battle was not the only brutality faced by members of the Sultanate; slavery was also rampant during the Tughlaq Dynasty. Though it had been practiced since the Sultanate was founded, ironically by an ex-slave, it flourished under Tughlaq. He patronized a slave trading market in which Indian and foreign slaves were brought to be sold, and he even made gifts of slaves to foreign rulers for diplomatic purposes. Because his regime was so strict, much of the territorial gain made by Sultan Tughlaq dissolved after his death. The Sayyid Dynasty replaced that of the Tughlaq in 1414, only to last a brief 37 years. The last Sayyid ruler, Alam Shah, surrendered Delhi to Bahlul Lodi in 1451, beginning the Lodi Dynasty.

The last chapter of the Delhi Sultanate lasted for 75 years, during which time multiple competing sultanates were annexed and new cities built. Sultan Sikandar Lodi founded the city of Agra in 1504 and made this the new capital of the kingdom. He also removed taxes on corn, enforced taxation audits on members of the nobility, and commissioned the translation of Sanskrit medical texts into Persian. Due to his religious fervor, many Muslim mosques were built and maintained within the borders of his Sultanate.

Lodi’s son and heir was the last of the Delhi Sultans, and he was killed at the Battle of Panipat, attempting to save his Sultanate from the encroaching Mughal Empire. The year was 1526.
