breakthrough in warfare and see them solely as instruments of deterrence.

Kapur agrees that newly nuclear states should tend to behave rationally. He argues, however, that rationality is not enough to ensure stability in a nuclear environment. Indeed, nuclear weapons can create incentives for rational states to engage in highly destabilizing behavior. This, in Kapur’s view, is precisely what has occurred in South Asia, making a nuclear subcontinent extremely dangerous.