Jammu, boycotted these elections. Consequently, 72 of the 75 members were elected unopposed on the National Conference ticket and no Praja Parishad members were elected because the nominations for all 27 of its candidates had been rejected. The boycott was to protest the rejection of the nominations of the Praja Parishad candidates. The newly constituted assembly was not a fair representative body. The fairness of the election was certainly open to challenge. Unlike the old 1939 Jammu and Kashmir state constitution, based on universal adult suffrage, both the compilation of electoral rolls (which had already begun in 1949) and the registration of nominations were supervised, with great care and efficiency, by Sheikh Abdullah's partisans. Less than 5 per cent of the potential electorate actually voted.

By mid-1951, the mélange of the various populist economic measures forced by Abdullah, his coterie of communist advisors and his public pronouncements, convinced the US State Department that the state of Jammu and Kashmir was the first port of call for both the Soviets and the Chinese communists in the subcontinent. Abdullah and his associates were believed to be in constant touch with Moscow and Beijing. Jammu and Kashmir, alongside West Asia and South-east Asia, was an ideal site for Soviet intervention and communist subversion. India's stubbornness on the Kashmir issue and its posture of international non-alignment did not help the US. President Truman and the Secretary of State, Dean Acheson tried to gauge how long they could let the Kashmir issue remain a Commonwealth matter, especially within the context of the deteriorating British prestige over all of its former colonial possessions.[17] One of the things holding them back was UN representative Frank Graham's mission on Kashmir that was carried out over the months of July,[18] August and September 1951. Its failure, following the earlier failures by the Canadian Gen. McNaughton, US Admiral Chester Nimitz and Australian jurist Owen Dixon, prompted the CIA to remind the state department that the position of Kashmir will decide the final scene of the political drama over Sinkiang. The Chinese PLA controlled most of Sinkiang by the spring of 1950 and the only organised resistance the PLA encountered was from Osman Batur's Kazakh
