returned to these demands in a meeting with Nehru. He complained about the injustices of the Sheikh Abdullah regime and hinted that if matters did not improve, Ladakh might seek to secede from India and join Tibet. He, however, made it clear that Ladakh was quite prepared to cohabit with Jammu Hindus but it needed to be, in some manner, separated from Srinagar. Bakula was increasingly unhappy about what appeared to be a Muslim domination of the region. These Ladakhi grievances were also communicated to Karan Singh during his visit to Leh in the latter part of 1952.

Serious opposition to Abdullah's regime developed in Jammu where non-Muslim political activity was dominated by the Praja Parishad. This political movement was launched at the end of 1947 by Balraj Madhok with the support of many members who had worked for the RSS and enjoyed close links with the charismatic President of the newly launched Bhartiya Jana Sangh, Dr Shyama Prasad Mookerjee. Dr Mookerjee was originally a congressman who had held the portfolio of industry and supplies in Nehru's dominion cabinet from 1947 to 1950. The Praja Parishad view, shared by Dr Mookerjee, was that Jammu and Kashmir's political evolution, under the guidance of Sheikh Abdullah, would increasingly drift away from incorporation into the Indian Union and move towards the creation of what might be called a mini-Pakistan, an Islamic, autonomous state. In Jammu and Kashmir, Dr Mookerjee commented that there were, or would soon be, 'two constitutions, two flags and two heads of the state in one country', and this 'cannot be tolerated'.[25]

The Delhi Accord greatly alarmed the Praja Parishad. Under the leadership of Prem Nath Dogra, a campaign of extra-parliamentary opposition to Abdullah's regime began in the autumn of 1952. Essentially a Hindu middle-class movement, it had been particularly disturbed by Sheikh Abdullah's land reforms and increasingly came to see the ruling National Conference both as an Islamic communal party and as a cover for the extension of communist ideology. It sought the separation of Jammu from the valley, either as a state in its own right or as part of Punjab. It advocated the abolition of Article 370 of the Indian Constitution and the termination of
