then it was probably not suited for heavy vehicles, but the road was upgraded by 1957 to allow passage of heavy vehicles.

The sources of this report are not clear. What is relatively unpublicised is that Capt. Rajendra Nath of the Indian Army's 11 Gorkha Rifles led the first clandestine reconnaissance mission into Aksai Chin in 1952, after the Chinese intrusion.[2] His report is still classified. It is not known whether his report was shared with the CIA and if it was a part of the CIA report.

It is also reported that a secret protocol was signed in July 1949, in New Delhi, between the US Secretary of State, Dean Acheson and B. N. Mullick, the IB Chief.[3] The protocol involved intelligence sharing between India and the US on China. In the light of both the CIA report and the army headquarters' Intelligence Directorate's information from the ground, it is difficult to comprehend if the CIA had actually shared any information with the IB or whether the army decided to keep this vital information from the IB. Was the IB Director aware of these facts? Did he know where India's frontier lay? Why then, did the Government of India sign the Panchsheel Agreement with China in 1954? Why did India surrender its consulates in Kashgar in Sinkiang and Gartok in Tibet? The Chinese local Commander, Han Tse-min, asserted that when these roads were completed, the Chinese communists would close the Tibet-Ladakh border and use it to trade. This is what happened a year later, soon after the infamous Panchsheel Agreement was signed. The CIA document even mentions Han declaring that the Chinese communists in Sinkiang were telling people that Ladakh belongs to Sinkiang.

The Chinese had followed their annexation of Sinkiang and Tibet in 1949–50 by annexing a large chunk of Aksai Chin. They sought to overturn the Treaty of Chushul, signed in 1842, between the Sikh Empire in India and the Guofeng Emperor of the Manchu dynasty in China. The Treaty of Chushul was regarded by Mao Tse-Tung as an 'unequal treaty' and they sought to slowly annex back Ladakh from India. This creeping annexation of Aksai Chin introduced a new dimension into the Kashmir saga. There is no record of why the highly unequal Panchsheel Agreement was signed
