cease to show much sympathy for Pakistan over its loss of control of Jammu and Kashmir.

From 1899 until the independence of India and Pakistan in 1947, the British maps' representation of the border of Jammu and Kashmir kept varying. In March 1899, Sir Claude MacDonald wrote a diplomatic note that proposed a new border between China and British India that would run through the Karakoram's and Kashmir; this line is now known as the McCartney-MacDonald Line and it still forms the basis of the border between Pakistan and China. The note proposed that China should relinquish its claims to suzerainty over Hunza and in return, Hunza should relinquish its claims to most of the Taghdumbash and Raskam districts. It also said that the border would broadly follow the main Karakoram crest dividing the watersheds of the Indus River and the Tarim River but would also pass through a Hunza post at Darwaza, near the Shimshal Pass. The Chinese did not respond to the note and the British took that as acquiescence. The McCartney Line was modified in 1905 to include, within India, a small area east of the Shimshal Pass and to put the border on the Oprang Jilga River and a stretch of the Shaksgam River.

After Pakistan voted to grant China a seat in the UN, the Chinese withdrew the disputed maps in January 1962, agreeing to enter border talks in March. Negotiations between the nations officially began on 13 October 1962 and resulted in an agreement signed on 2 March 1963 by foreign ministers, Chen Yi of China and Bhutto of Pakistan. The agreement resulted in the surrendering of 13,000 square miles of territory by Pakistan to China.[6] This was the world's most heavily glaciated region with around 250 glaciers. The Sino-Pak Boundary Agreement of 2 March 1963 gave rise to bitter resentment in India and it is probable that it contributed to the failure of the 1963 US-brokered Indo-Pak negotiations on Kashmir.

The series of Indo-Pak talks on Kashmir, brokered by the US, started on 27 December 1962 in Rawalpindi.[7] On the eve of the talks, Pakistan announced that it had reached an agreement with China on their common border in Kashmir. Despite India's sense of betrayal by this Sino-Pak deal, the Kashmir talks went on for six sessions. The third round of talks in