

Image 10.2: Location of Siachen Glacier
Source: Archives of AIM Television Pvt. Ltd.

The physical control of the Siachen area by India places the status of Pakistan as the party in control of the area in question by shifting the presumed India and Pakistan and China tri-junction from the Karakoram Pass, almost 100 km to the west, near Indira Col. If a settlement of the India and Pakistan boundary is reached by extending the LoC up to Indira Col, it would require China to renegotiate this section of the boundary with India.[20]

The Sino-Pak Boundary Agreement of 1963 was clearly a case of collusive cartographic aggression by both China and Pakistan against a weakened India.[21] The Kargil War was an example of Pakistan trying to emulate India but failing miserably in securing control of the heights in the Kargil area and thus endangering the Srinagar-Leh highway. If the Kargil War had ended in Pakistan's favour, notwithstanding India's nuclear status, the Chinese would have come down from the Shaksgam Valley to the Urdok Glacier and then onto the Indira Col. Coupled with a thrust from the east, from Daulat Beg Oldie, Chinese forces would have captured the Indian Army in a pincer movement.