as the Pakistanis were clearly targeting the dam. It was only when the Indian Army brought in its heavy artillery and gave the Pakistanis a taste of their own medicine did the intensive shelling subside. Today, the Indian Army has permanently stationed artillery near the Kishenganga Dam to provide deterrence against any new Pakistani misadventure in this sector. Eventually, all the three units of the dam were commissioned and synchronised with the electricity grid by 30 March 2018. On 19 May 2018, Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi inaugurated the Kishenganga hydropower project. The project is a symbol of the tenacity and resilience of the Government of India, which stood steadfast with true grit, without yielding to the extreme provocation it was subjected to. The amount of electricity generated by the NHPC from Kishenganga is only 1,713 million units. This may be insignificant in relation to the scale of the national grid, but the project has allowed India to assert its control over Kashmir's natural resources. Across the LoC, frantic activity on the Neelum project enabled it to be connected to Pakistan's national grid on 13 August 2018.

Interestingly, it is useful to analyse Chinese moves in Ladakh during the period of construction of the Kishenganga project. Is there any pattern that is evident? Looking at 2008, when the work on the Kishenganga project was commencing and pro-azaadi demonstrations had restarted in the valley in June 2008, we saw Chinese incursions into Indian territory across the LoC suddenly increased during that summer. There were 2,285 instances of border violations in Ladakh in 2008, particularly in Demchok, Koyul and Chushul. Further near Chumar and Skagjung, in the Chang Tang National Nature Reserve, China forced Tibetan shepherds from its side of the border to send in cattle near the village of Dungti to establish a claim to 'traditional grazing' grounds. As the government wasn't able to join the dots,[43] India's reaction was tepid to say the least.

In 2013, when the CPEC was announced and construction restarted at Kishenganga and there were demonstrations against the project at Bandipore along with intensive Pakistani shelling in the Gurez sector, the Chinese PLA intruded 19 km deep into Indian territory at Burthe in the Daulat Beg Oldie sector in Ladakh. This was a serious incident intended to
