river Jhelum flows into the plains of Punjab. On the east bank of Jhelum, in a place known to the Greeks as Hydaspes, Alexander the Great killed the son of King Porus in a battle. However, before succumbing to Alexander's sword, the brave warrior managed to kill Alexander's horse, Bucephalus.[2]

The town of Bafliaz on the Old Mughal Road between Jammu and Srinagar probably derives its name from Alexander's much-beloved horse. Common folklore claims that this is the place where Bucephalus was buried. They claim that a shrine was erected here in his memory, but there exists no trace of it. Thereafter, from 206 BC, Kashmir was part of the ancient Silk Route that connected China with southern Europe. Contemporary revisionist scholars of Christianity like Holger Kersten, Fida Hassnain and Suzanne Olson argue that Jesus Christ took this route to Kashmir when he escaped from the cross.[3] According to them, the famous Rozabal shrine in the Khanyar suburb of Srinagar is the tomb of Jesus Christ, who was known in Kashmir as 'Yuz Asaf'. The shrine consists of a wooden structure built over a gravestone. Access to the inner sanctum, which is believed to contain a sarcophagus laid east to west in Hebrew tradition, has now been shut off to the public. Near the gravestone lies a rock carving of a wounded pair of feet. Though the shrine has a Sunni Muslim caretaker, he was unable to convince the authors of why there was a stone engraving in this shrine, given that mainstream aniconism in Islam proscribes the creation of images of sentient beings.
