Dogra. Nehru believed that Dogra was financed by the Maharaja. The Jammu Hindus mostly regarded the Maharaja as their leader and gave him total support.

Meanwhile in Poonch, after the death of Raja Jagat Dev Singh in 1940, Maharaja Hari Singh appointed a guardian for his minor son, Shiv Ratandev Singh, and used the opportunity to integrate the Poonch jagir into the state of Jammu and Kashmir. The Rajmata, Jagat Dev Singh's widow, took the young heir and fled into exile in Nepal, fearful of their lives. Poonch became a district of Jammu that was administered by the officers of Jammu and Kashmir. This resulted in Poonch's loss of autonomy and subjected its people to the increased taxation levied by the Kashmir state, both of which were resented by the people. Sardar Muhammad Ibrahim Khan led the people of Poonch to protest against measures; he was a protégé of the late Raja Jagat Dev Singh.[6]

Khan, who was biding his time as an agent provocateur while serving as the Assistant Advocate General of the state, resigned from his job and secured a Muslim Conference ticket to fight the assembly elections in 1947. Kak was very pleased that a non-valley, British-educated Muslim, who ostensibly shared his strategic overview, would be a member of the legislative assembly and would likely be gullible enough to be manipulated by him. Little did Kak know that the seeds of revenge and rebellion had already been planted in Sardar Muhammad Ibrahim Khan's mind by Raja Jagat Dev Singh. Sardar Muhammad Ibrahim Khan won the election from Bagh Sudhanoti constituency and returned to Poonch after attending the assembly session in March–April 1947. The time was ripe to seek vengeance and a motive presented itself. By his own account, Khan was thoroughly convinced that there was a conspiracy brewing between the state forces and the RSS, so he politically mobilised the people of Poonch and set in motion a chain of events that would lead to the formation of Azad Kashmir some months later.
