This arrangement had a hidden subtext—both these British officers would have to resign their respective commissions with the British Army. What was the need for this, unless Col. Bacon had some questionable tasks in mind for these officers when he spoke with Maj. Brown? What were these questionable tasks and what were the assurances and incentives offered to these young men to quit their coveted commissions? Col. Bacon wanted these young men to operate at an arm's length from the British Government in their private capacities as private mercenaries. Ismay was worried that if it ever came out that serving British officers had participated in a conspiracy to execute the Gilgit Rebellion and defeat the objectives of the British Parliament, there would be a monumental scandal. Ismay was only too aware of the impact of the 1946 RAF mutiny.

It is obvious that Bacon wanted the preservation of the Gilgit Agency under Pax Britannica and the method by which this could be effected, despite Partition, would be to make the Gilgit Agency an agency of the NWFP, directly under its governor. On Partition, Sir George Cunningham was to take over as the Governor of NWFP.[14] The preparations would then be complete.

Having obtained Brown and Mathieson's consent, Bacon flew back to Srinagar the very next day to swing these appointments. Indirect endorsement of their acceptance came in the form of an urgent wireless message from the Inspector General of the Frontier Corps; Brown was asked to reach the Bala Hisar Fort, Peshawar. At the fort, the IG presented a way out for Brown if he wished to reconsider this assignment. Brown, however, stuck to his mission. On 29 July 1947, Brown boarded a Harvard trainer aircraft and flew to Gilgit. That this was possible so fast reveals that the conspiracy to execute the Gilgit Rebellion was thought out well in advance, had key British players and intended to defeat the Viceroy's intent of nudging the Maharaja to accede to India on or around 15 August 1947.

The conspirators in key places appear to at least be the following:

1. Lord Hastings Ismay, Chief of Staff to the Viceroy of India, Lord Mountbatten
