as per Col. Bacon's instructions, over the next week, plans were put into place for formalising recruitment of additional scouts, organising their training and ensuring their equipment: from wireless radios, automatic weapons to pack mules. On 24 November 1947, Col. Bacon ordered Brown to appear at Peshawar for briefings. The same Harvard aircraft piloted by the same Squadron Leader Ahmed flew Brown to Peshawar, on 25 November 1947. On landing in Peshawar, Brown was driven up to Khyber House, the residence of Col. Roger Bacon. After being debriefed by the Colonel, the two of them then drove across to the Government House to meet the NWFP Governor, Sir George Cunningham for the most important debriefing. Brown was asked to prepare a detailed report along with maps of ground positions. He was also met by Charles Duke, the British Deputy High Commissioner in Peshawar and former Political Agent in south Waziristan. Duke was also given a copy of the Brown report and this was forwarded to Whitehall.[20]

Col. Bacon also called his old friend from Sandhurst, Lt. Col. Iskander Mirza, who was Pakistan's Defence Secretary and later, Pakistan's President, and asked him to fly into Peshawar to meet Brown. Brown and Bacon both briefed Mirza. A British mercenary who had waged war against the king had come in from the cold and was warmly received back in the folds of the British deep state. Such was the treachery at hand in the execution of all of the variants of operations Gulmarg and Datta Khel.

This story has an interesting postscript. After his return from Gilgit in 1947, William Brown was appointed to the Frontier Constabulary, the police force of the NWFP in Pakistan, in which he served in various capacities for the next two years. In July 1948, William Brown was awarded the Member of British Empire (MBE) by the King-Emperor with an unspecified citation. The act of awarding Maj. Brown an MBE, even though he had not only resigned his commission in the army but also that he had waged war against the King-Emperor, was one of the enduring paradoxes of British rule in the Indian subcontinent. This final act confirms that both operations Gulmarg and Datta Khel were the brainchildren of the British deep state and this confounded legacy continues to haunt the
