sides that ran from the fort to the water. On the other side, was the rising ground with its circumference surrounded by a big ditch. The torrent had helped those occupying the fort in carrying stones the size of mortars. As per Babur's knowledge, no fort of such class was ever defended with stones of such large size as those taken into Madu.

A large stone was dropped on Kitta Beg's elder brother, Abdul Qasim Kohbur as he went under the ramparts. He came down rolling, without once getting to his feet, from that great height down to the foot of the glacis. And then a stone flung from a double waterway hit Yar Ali Balal in his head leaving it trepanned. The wrath of falling stones spelled disaster for Babur's men. Many of them perished. However, Babur's men made a great comeback by facing the showering stones. The assault began with the next dawn, and they kept fighting till the evening. They had lost the water-thief and hence could not continue the fight the next morning. They came out and sought to agree on the terms. Babur took around four scores of Khalil's men and sent them to Andijān for safekeeping as some of his begs and household were prisoners in their hands. The Madu affair turned out very well for Babur.

After having finished this campaign successfully, Babur and his men went to Unju Tupa, a village in Osh, and dismounted there.

On the other hand, unsuccessful Tambal retired from Andijān and went to sub-district Rabat-i-Sarhang. He dismounted in the village called Ab-i-Khān. Now, Babur and Tambal were merely five miles away from each other.

But despite such proximity, there was no war or battle for around six weeks.

But peace is not eternal.

The foragers on both sides were at play with each passing day. While the people of Tambal could see Babur's camp, ditches were dug all around as a sign of precaution. Babur also made his soldiers go out in their mail along the ditch. Despite such watchfulness, a night alarm was given every two or three days, and the cry to keep arms up.

But one eventful day, when Sayyidi Beg Taghai had gone out with the foragers, the foe (Tambal's forces) came up suddenly in massive strength taking him a prisoner.
