Babur has further informed that he was addicted to wine but on his sober days, used to attend the prayers, and that he was moderate in gifting and fairly liberal.

He wrote the naskh-taliq[†] characters very well and was a very good painter. He gave himself a pen name, ‘Adili’ and composed many beautiful verses. Babur has mentioned that he would have made a good Diwan had he lived for longer. Below is one of his couplets:[‡]

> Like a wavering shadow I fall here and there;
> If not propped by a wall, I drop flat on the ground.

Baysonqor Mīrzā was reputed as a poet throughout the land, and they were often found in most houses of Samarkand.

He died too young to have engaged in many battles. However, he did fight two ranged battles. The first one was fought with Sulṭān Mahmud Khān when Baysonqor was first seated on the throne in AD 1495. Mahmud Khān had incited and stirred up Sulṭān Junaid Barlas and others to desire the throne of Samarkand. They had led an army, crossed the Aq Kutal and reached Rabat-i-Soghd and then Kanbai. Baysonqor Mīrzā had ridden out from Samarkand and fought with them near Kanbai. That battle had seen abundant bloodbath and success. Around 4000 Moghūls were slain. He had fought the second battle unsuccessfully against Sulṭān Ali Mira at Bukhara in AD 1496.

Sulṭān Mahmud Mīrzā had gifted him Bukhara after Sulṭān Mahmud Khān had died. All his begs had assembled and agreed to make Baysonqor Mīrzā ruler in Samarkand. Bukhara was included in Samarkand’s jurisdiction which went out of his hands after the Tarkhān rebellion in AD 1496. Babur got possession of it in AD 1497 when Baysonqor Mīrzā decided to go to Khusrau Shah. Khusrau took hold of Ḥisār and gave it to him.

He was married to the daughter of his paternal uncle Sulṭān Khalil Mīrzā but died without an heir. Babur informs that in all his rule one thing was clear—that he never ruled with authority. Hence, it gave his begs lots of free hand.
