Almighty. The very morning of victory, Babur's grandmother Shah Sulṭān Begum arrived from Andijān thinking that he had captured Jahangir Mīrzā.[*]

Winter Comes

Winter had kissed the land, stripping the countryside of grains and fruits. With the continuous lashing of the freezing wind, it was certainly not desirable to move further against Tambal in Auzkint. They decided to make a move to Andijān.

A few days later, prudent men from Babur's side, decided that staying in town would not be wise. They thought that this might end up strengthening the enemy and it would be easier for them to carry on raids with guerilla warfare. They agreed that the soldiers needed to get enough grains and that some blockade against the enemy could be created. With these thoughts, they next marched out of Andijān, respecting the ongoing winter and settled down near Armiyan and Nushab in the Rabatik Aurchini. Upon reaching those villages, they immediately got to the job of preparing winter quarters. This place was popularly known as the 'land between the two rivers'.

The place happened to be a perfect quarter for Babur and his men with its vicinity being more than perfect for hunting. The jungle near Ailaish River was full of pigs, hares and pheasants. They could also spot foxes and Babur admits that they were much swifter than those he had ever seen.

Staying there, Babur had developed this routine of hunting twice or thrice a week. He was especially fond of pheasants and it became his staple food during this whole winter stay.

It was during the stay in winter quarters that Khudai Birdi Tughchi was promoted to the rank of beg. He fell to the enemy within a day of this promotion. Along with him, raiders of Tambal beheaded many more from Babur's camp. Babur acted immediately and sent out his warriors from Osh and Andijān, attacking the enemies riding back on their horses. They were caught and enslaved. If the whole winter had been passed in those quarters, it was highly probable that the enslaved ones, including many heads, would have simply broken without any fight.

This winter quarter was proving to be a place from where Babur had begun to break the enemy big time.

But when the enemy was already growing weaker with every passing day, Qambar Ali again pleaded with Babur for leave to go to his district.