Work must be snatched at betimes.

Vain is the slacker's mistimed work.

Seizing the advantage of a respite till the morrow, the enemy slipped away in the night, and without dismounting on the road, went into Fort Archian. When a morrow's move against a foe was made, Babur found none to be present. Feeling the failure, Babur and his men went after him. They were not convinced well to lay a close siege on Archian and hence dismounted two miles off in Ghazna Namangan.

Babur and his men stayed in a camp there for around six weeks while Tambal stayed in Fort Archian. Now and then a very few men from Babur and Tambal's side would meet midway, pick up small fights and return to their respective camps.

But, on one fateful night, Babur's enemy attacked them vehemently. He rained arrows from the sky to destroy Babur's camp. However, the rain of arrows could not bring much loss to Babur as his camp was encircled by ditches. That apart, Babur also had set surveillance and was aware of what was set to come and hence had kept his whole camp prepared. Amid these hostilities, Babur had some unprecedented and silly challenges. Qambar Ali was determined to go back to his district. Once he even got to his horse and started in anger. Then Babur had to send several begs after Qambar, who persuaded them to return.

Time was running by and Babur had to do something quickly. Sayyid Yusuf of Macham managed to send the headman of one of the two foothills of Andijān, Macham and Awighur to Tambal. At that time, he had been well known in Babur's gate, although he could never become a beg. In Babur's opinion, he was a hypocrite with no substantial principled understanding of his own. Babur could recall that, from his last capture of Andijān (June of AD 1499) to the time of then (February of AD 1500) he had revolted thrice against Tambal and joined him again and again. He had reciprocated the same with Babur too. But Babur recalled that it was the last change of side that he did. Babur always doubted that he and his other companions in the Moghūl horde would betray by joining Tambal. Loaded with such fear, Babur ensured that he had his trustworthy men riding in the middle of those Moghūls.

They had reached Bishkharan just by halting once at night. Babur had been speculating quite a bit. After doubting that Qambar and his
