companions were siding with Tambal, now he even feared that Tambal's men would have already barged into the fort.

Thinking for quite some time, Babur sent a party of his begs which included Ali Darwesh Beg and Quch Beg. They went near the gate of Bishkharan where a small skirmish took place with the enemies. The Beg brothers and others did well and no harm was inflicted upon them.

Finally, Babur and his men dismounted two miles off from Bishkharan at an altitude good enough to keep a watch. On the other hand, Tambal along with Jahangir dismounted close by too with a fort behind him.

However, Babur was not keen on trusting begs, going by their historical conduct. He had always doubted Ali Dost and Qambar Ali. And now, with their followers, they began to interpose between the peace talks. Babur and many others in his camp were completely unaware of this peace project which two of his main begs had taken up. Now when Babur heard about this, although dejected, he chose to go ahead with the flow of time. He knew that any disagreement with either of the two wouldn't lead to the right consequences.

The peace pact was inevitable, and it occurred. The districts of Khujand at the end of Akhsi, along with control of water, were passed to Jahangir while the districts on the side of Andijān came to Babur. Auzkint remained in Babur's jurisdiction of Babur. Agreements were made and Babur along with Jahangir further decided to go against Samarkand as an ally. It was decided that when Babur owned Samarkand, Andijān would be granted to Jahangir.

Soon after signing the settlement, the next day (the last week of February in AD 1500), Jahangir accompanied by Tambal visited Babur showering his deference. The terms were ratified in the court.

Jahangir was given Akhsi and Babur retained Andijān as per the agreement's terms. All prisoners, including Khalil of Tambal, were released. Babur has mentioned that they were conferred with the robe of honour, hence this perhaps would be the Tīmūrid or Moghūl lineage tradition. Even the captured begs, commanders and households of Babur, were released. Taghai Beg, Muhammad Dost, Mir Shah Quchin, Sayyidi Qara Beg, Qasim-i-Ajab, Mir Wais and Mirim Diwan were the few of whom were released.
