Babur Arrives at Andijān

Now that Babur had made his comeback to Andijān after ages, things were supposed to strike a happier note; however, he still was burning with the pain of his father's loss in one of the most unfortunate ways. Though it had been a bit more than half a decade since the unfortunate incident, the pain lingered within Babur.

Meanwhile, the behaviour of one of his closest aides, Ali Dost, had begun to change drastically. He along with many other companions of Babur, who had stood by him during his hardships of the guerrilla days, had turned completely discourteous—the reflection of which began to appear in his administrative actions. As a result, Babur dismissed Khalifa. Next, Ali Dost seized and plundered Ibrahim Sam and Wais Laghari. Not only this, but he also dismissed them and took away their districts. Babur found them to be at no fault and the act of Ali Dost to be an error of judgement. When Babur insisted on understanding his actions, he replied that Khalifa and Ibrahim had a certain sympathy for Khwaja-i-Qazi and they would take revenge against Babur someday. But Ali Dost was decidedly not going to stop easily. He was determined to bring more troubles, which Babur could not understand why. He got into some loose brawl with Qasim Beg and made the latter leave from Babur's proximity.

On the other hand, Ali Dost's son Muhammad Dost reinforced himself into the royal footing. He had Ali's support. He had begun to conduct courts and workshops exactly in the way Sultāns did. Babur had received clues that the father and son had absolute backing from Tambal. Babur seemed helpless as now Tambal and Jahangir had turned into an ally. And the Dost father-son duo was just doing every possible mischief that came to their heart without restraint. They were in the continual business of humiliating Babur's men. Perhaps they had not spared even Babur.
