Relating to the situation he composed the following verse originally in Persian:[†]

May none be as I, humbled and wretched and love-sick.

No beloved as thou art to me, cruel and careless.

Perhaps this was composed for his newly found love in the young lad, Baburi.

And in this new tourney of affair and friendship, Baburi had begun to visit Babur often. Yet again, modest, and bashful (as asserted by Babur himself in the Baburnama) Babur couldn't look straight into his eyes. He was hesitant to even strike up a conversation with him. And every time, he would return, Babur could never thank him and would wonder how again he would address him. Baburi's presence always filled him with joy but being unable to talk brought agitation too. He always wondered what power he had to command the duty of service to himself.

Babur has narrated a very interesting incident. Once, filled with desire and passion, when he was walking along a lane of town with his companions, he bumped into Baburi. He could not decide what to do next and in a state of confusion, he almost went right off without uttering a single word. Babur found it impossible to even look straight at him, forget uttering a word. Filled with shyness and shame, Babur recalled a Persian couplet by Muhammad Salih[*] in his mind:[†]

I am abashed with shame when I see my friend;

My companions look at me, I look the other way.

Indeed, that couplet went well with Babur's situation.

In Babur's words, entangled in that frothing desire and passion, under that stress of youthful folly, he used to wander, bare-headed, bare-foot, through streets and lanes, orchards and vineyards. As all this proceeded, he cared to show civility neither to his friend nor the stranger. He was completely carefree, not thinking either of himself or others around him.

In the context of the very situation, Babur composed yet another couplet in Turkic whose translation reads as below:[‡]

Out of myself, desire rushed me, unknowing,

That this is so with the lover of a fairy-face.
