Babur asserts that he had turned crazy. He used to wander over hills and plains like a madman. Sometimes, he roamed crazily in gardens, suburbs and lanes one by one. He was not being nomadic by choice, but as he has mentioned, it was the time that was making him do so. Although he wandered extensively, he did not at all know where is he going to be put up.

He composed a Turkic couplet describing the situation he was in:[§]

Nor power to go was mine, nor power to stay;

I was just what you made me, o thief of my heart.

Brawl of Sulṭān Ali Mīrzā with the Tarkhāns

When Babur got married, Sulṭān Ali Mīrzā fell out with Muhammad Mazid Tarkhān for the following reasons:

a) The Tarkhāns had risen to overwhelming predominance and honour.
b) Baqi-Chaghānīānī had gulped away the whole revenue of the Bukhara government without giving a single penny to anyone else.
c) Muhammad Mazid Tarkhān had taken complete control in Samarkand. He kept all its districts for his sons and dependents. Only a small part's control lay in the hands of Ali Mīrzā and hence the revenue.

Babur kept wondering what made such a mature man like Sulṭān Ali Mīrzā not resist the ills of Tarkhānis. But soon Babur was informed that Ali with the support of a few households, was planning to act against Muhammad Mazid Tarkhān. It was not only Babur, but the cunning and smart Tarkhāni too got the notice of this adventure being planned by Ali. Tarkhān decided to teach a good lesson to Ali Mīrzā and began to ride out with trusted companions like Sulṭān Husain Arghun, Pir Ahmad, Auzun Hasan's younger brother, Khwaja Husain, Qara Barlas and Salih Muhammad, etc.

The Khān joined Khān Mīrzā. He appointed many Moghūl begs, including Muhammad Hussain Dughlat and Ahmad Beg to get into action against Samarkand. Around this period, Hafiz Beg Duldai and his son Tahir Beg were guardians to Khān Mīrzā. Building on relationships as a diplomatic bridge, Muhamamd Sighal's grandson, Hasan and Hindu Beg
