> he did not go at all. And amid all this drama, he could craft the chance of the hollowness of Osh to go by night and bring shockers to all.

Babur understood that for several reasons there was no advantage in entangling themselves with him. And hence, even though Babur was very close by while en route, he chose to keep going straight without encountering Khalil. Babur mentioned that one of the reasons for doing so was that most of his men had been to their homes on account of the truce. Babur had not bothered about any news from them, relying on the assumption that nothing bizarre would happen against the backdrop of the peace. Perhaps, the treachery and falsity weren't expected from Khalil on any ground though the truth had to be something of great contradiction.

The non-reliability on his begs like Ali Dost and Qambar Ali had also made Babur think against any thought of aggression. That apart, the Samarkand begs under Muhammad Mazid Tarkhān had sent Mir Moghūl to invite Babur and hence he found no interest in wasting days for anything as a capital such as Samarkand stood up in his eyes.

And then, Babur moved from Qaba on to Margilan which was around a score of miles from there. Then, Margilan lay in the hands of Quch Beg's father Sulṭān Qardwal as handed over by Babur years ago.

Babur asked Sulṭān Qardwal to join him on the way ahead, but he refused, claiming that the other ties and responsibilities did not permit him to do so. But his son Quch Beg, along with two of his brothers (younger and elder) came with Babur. Taking the road for Asfara, they dismounted in one of its villages, called Mahan. While they were resting in Mahan, of pleasant surprise for Babur appeared Qasim Beg Quchum accompanied by Ali Dost, Sayyid Qasim and various other warrior men.

Babur along with them and his warriors rode from Mahan crossing the Khasban plain, Chapan Bridge reaching Aūrā-tīpā.

Qambar Ali Reprimands Himself

Now, Qambar Ali, who fully trusted Tambal, went to Akhsi from his Khujand district. He had the sole purpose of discussing military matters with Tambal. Seeing this happen as wished, Tambal imprisoned Qambar Ali and marched against his district.
