camp. After fleeing he had taken the audience of Sulṭān Ali and informed him of Babur's plan to take over the town. Babur was informed that Sulṭān Ali was on his guard, which was way stronger than Babur's. Hence, Babur stopped the campaign and returned to Dar-i-Gham's bank.

During Babur's stay in Yar Yilaq, one of his favoured begs, Ibrahim Surdu who was looted and driven off by Ali Dost, came to him. He offered Babur due obeisance along with Muhammad Yusuf who had accompanied him. The latter was the son of Sayyid Yusuf (Aughlaqchi). Soon, one by one, many old servants and Babur's begs appeared. All of them had some sort of enmity with Ali Dost. A few were put off by his arrogance, others for having been imprisoned while many were plundered and hence had collective rage against the tyrant Ali. Muhammad Yusuf and others seemed badly afraid and perturbed. It was Tambal's backing that had prompted Ali to persecute several of those who favoured Babur. Babur was infuriated by the tale of Ali Dost's persecutions.

Now that Babur was familiar with his deeds, Ali Dost could not face the Padishah. He decided to take a leave and Babur obliged by giving him so. Perhaps Babur was unclear on how to punish Ali who had been an ally for long.

To make matters more complicated, a panicked Ali Dost along with his son Muhammad Dost went to Babur's enemy Tambal. Over time, they had become very good friends. Their relationship had turned highly intimate which along with enmity against Babur made them utter multiple seditious phrases against the latter.

It was the July of AD 1500. Ali Dost left the world because of a deadly ulcer on his hand. Now that his father had departed the mortal world, Muhammad Dost imagined a good life under the Aūzbegs. Babur has mentioned that perhaps treachery ran in his blood, and he knew nothing of what it meant to respect the one whose salt you eat. He fled to the foothills of Andijān. There he began conspiring to revolt against the Aūzbegs after drawing local support. But Aūzbegs were no pussyfooted and they would teach him a lesson harsh enough to stay with him his whole life. They tracked the traitor Muhamad and pierced his eyes, blinding him for a lifetime.

Now that Ali and Muhammad were off the way, Babur began to think again of some actions to bring favour to his realm. He sent Ghuri Barlas