Next, they began to go up the valley of the Kam torrent and over the Sara Taq Pass. One of the servants of Khusrau Shah appeared with a gift of nine horses and clothes for Babur as they reached Nundak. The number nine was considered a good omen in Turco-Mongol tradition. Babur dismounted with his party once he reached the mouth of Kam Valley.

Then, Sher Ali a close confidant of Babur, deserted to Khusrau Shah's brother. The very next day, Wali and Quch Beg parted from Babur too and rode to Ḥisār. They entered the valley and scaled it. The roads were extremely narrow and steep. Before reaching the Sara Taq pass, they had to make three- or four-night halts. Babur was overwhelmed by the sight of the pass. In his words, he had never come across any pass of such shape and form. He had never traversed such ravines and precipices. They could manage to pass through the dangerous narrow passage which had sudden falls, perilous heights and knife-edge saddles. The range was known as Fann Mountain which had a large lake called Iskanderkul. It ranged to a circumference of two miles and its beauty had left Babur stunned. It had come at the cost of thorough difficulty and suffering, with countless hardships and miseries.

As Babur marvelled at the beauty of the stunning lake, a piece of bad news arrived. Ibrahim Tarkhān had got himself positioned at the Fort Shiraz. Furthermore, Qambar Ali and Abu'l Qasim Kohbur had come to Yar Yilaq. They had strengthened the lower forts and had them occupied. Qasim Kohbur had been unable to stay in Khwaja Didar with the Aūzbegs in Samarkand.

Leaving Fann, Babur moved ahead to Keshtud. The headman of Fann had a reputation for great hospitality, generosity and kindness. He was known to have given tribute of four scores of horses to Sulṭān Masud Mīrzā at the time when the latter had attacked Hisar, and he had been through Fann to see his younger brother Baysonghor Sulṭān Mīrzā in Samarkand. It is said that he had given a similar reception to others as well. However, he did not receive Babur in such a fashion. In Babur's own words, he had sent a worse than ordinary horse to him and he did not wait to receive him.

The man who had always been generous turned out to be a miser, short-hearted person when it came to treating Babur (in the latter's opinion). Babur says that 'the politeness of the polite was forgotten'.
